The declaration of custodian of records is essentially a sworn statement attesting that the person submitting certain records is authorized to do so and that the records are authentic and maintained in the regular course of business. In California, this declaration is often required to ensure that the evidence or records submitted in court or to other entities, such as insurance companies, are genuine, complete, and reliable.

Why Is This Declaration Important?

In legal proceedings, the authenticity of records such as medical ?les, business documents, or employment records can be challenged. The declaration serves as an a?davit from the custodian of records ? the individual responsible for maintaining these records ? a?rming their validity. This declaration helps streamline the admission of evidence by reducing the need for live testimony from record keepers, which can save time and resources during trials or hearings.

Without this declaration, opposing parties might argue over the authenticity or completeness of the documents, potentially delaying the process or even leading to exclusion of important evidence.
